

In assembling a team for the network, Kids Sports News Network is specifically looking to acquire "predators," or producer/editors, but covering athletes isn't all that Kids Sports News Network is about. Soon they'll get kids involved in other aspects of the production as sportswriters.

of famous big-league stadiums like Fenway Park, Wrigley Field and Yankee Stadium. The coverage of CHUSA that they gathered is now in the process of being assembled for a show, which will be broadcast on August 7th.

"They were very professional in their production. During our event they had all their staff and camera people and reporters, all the things you'd expect from a broadcast production crew. It was quite exciting for both the players and the parents in the program to know that they're going to be on TV," said Malosi Taeleifi, president of CHUSA. "I think that locally we'll attract more players and families to participate in the program, and also, we have a message to send and I believe we've done a pretty good job expressing it."

KSNM will also be covering the Connie Mack World Series, which is for players in the junior division (ages 16-18). The series, sponsored by the American Amateur Baseball Conference (AABC), will be held in August of this year and can draw up to 80,000 spectators over the
